KRIENS SYMPHONY CLUB

Concert Given by an Orchestral Preparatory Or-

Kriens conductor, gave a concert last evening in Carnegie Hall. The orchestral numbers were the overture to "Der Freischuetz," the andante and final allegro of Beethoven's fifth symphony, two short numbers by Tschalkowsky and an oratorio called "The Comforter," by Margaret Hoberg, and the coronation march from "Le Prophete." There were two soloists-Portia Martin Burley, soprano, who sang "Depuis je Jour," from "Louise": "Caro nome," from "Rigoletto," and some songs, and Katherine Strang, violinist, who played the first movement of the Mendelssohn concerto. Mr. Kriens is a Dutch composer who has settled in this city and has been represented several times on the programmes of the Barrere Ensemble. His symphony club is composed of young men, young women and one small boy, who holds the proud post of second concertmaster. The organization is an orchestra and its aim is to prepare musi-cians for careers as orchestral players. Some professionals were required last evening to fill some positions; but this is invariably the case in such bodies as

A definite demand for public consideration of last evening's concert was made, but a performance by neophytes cannot be too seriously considered. Some of the players did not appear on the stage till ten minutes after the hour at which the entertainment was advertised to begin. Perhaps these might be instructed that tardiness is not tolerated by the conductors to whom they will later look for employment.

There was a good deal of looseness in the counting of bars and the entrances were in general lacking in precision. Counting bars will be found to count more with conductors than hand-some gowns. Justice Forker was the son of James Forker, a wholesale tobacconist of Utica, N. Y., and was 18 years old when the family moved to Brooklyn. After graduating from the Polytechnic Institute he went to Yale, and after being graduated from the law school began practising in Manhattan. He was soon appointed an Assistant Corporation Counsel in the old city of Brooklyn and held the position for several years.

He was appointed to the Court of Special Sessions by Mayor Van Wyck fifteen years ago and was reappointed by Mayor Gaynor. He was a Democrat, but belonged to no clubs or societies.

He was greatly interested in poetry, and his last poem, which he entitled "The Ghost of Me," was intended to solace his family after his death. He leaves a wife,
